This is because a more fibrotic diaphragm cannot increase the functional volume of the thorax, and therefore is unable to add pressure to the lungs. This results in symptoms such as dyspnea. In all of the studies involving patients with diffuse SSc, pulmonary function testing was performed with the diaphragm in a position of relaxation. It was surprising that diffuse SSc patients with the lowest volume and diffusing capacity had the lowest number of cycles in the tidal breathes and the highest number of cycles in the tidal breathes. This finding is most likely due to the fact that
