of zinc-sequestering hormone status on pigment pattern development in C. maculata . We used six different ecotypes (WK2, USA-5, MD-100, TO4-6, TO4-3, TO4-7) across two populations (A and B) separated by 12 km. Ecotypes differed in geographic location and habitat (an ocean outwash adjacent to urban bay in a North Atlantic fishery). Larvae were collected with a seine net with a 10 µm mesh size in specific estuarine waters immediately after they hatched. Some records come from coastal waters rather than estuaries, but we consider this likely to be an artifact since larval density is usually higher in estuaries than inshore coastal waters. Collection location, habitat, and ecology are not likely to be important sources of variance in this study because larval density can be assumed to be homogenous across most estuaries. Every encystment of a caddisfly lasts about 10--14 h. The larvae are then released and resuspend and become free-living stream, bay, or estuary migrants. The descriptions of the seven days following a particular ecotype's first contact with fresh, marine water are subdivided into 24 sub-epochs such that there is a different sub-epoch, such that there is a different sub-epoch, each 7 hours between the initial estuary contact and capping the fourth cyst of each ecotype (A total of 84 sub-epochs per ecotype). The first sub-epoch was started immediately after estuarine ecotypes entered the experiments and capping occurred 50 h later. One ml of seawater containing approximately 5,000 C. maculata larvae, surrounding the smallest cyst sheath, was transferred to each styrofoam device (5 cm long, 1.5 cm in diameter) containing 8.5 ml seawater in a Styrofoam box on a shaker at ambient room temperature (18--22°C). Larvae were not fed during the course of the experiment. Larvae were allowed to settle and metamorphose into adults over a six-day period. After six days, adults were thoroughly mixed after dark, by passing a small canula through each device and into 1 L of seawater. The entire contents of each styrofoam box was then placed in a 35 mm wide plastic vial on a Petri

Shines' new project

I have created this album as more of a tribute to Shines. His music has a unique feel that brings its own inspiration to the listener. Shines is far and away the best user (and has achieved some amazing things) - but our Metalist would be vacant without his contributions. My only way to express my thanks. Before we get into the offerings, I'd like to introduce myself.

My name is Lee, and I have to say that before I did any real writing, I knew I was destined to be the greatest coder/program
