I'm trying to understand how the kernel decides which boot sector to load when the computer reboots. As far as I know, the signature of the boot sector is stored in the boot sectors (0, 0, 0). In some platforms, when the system reboots, it loads a boot sector that has a different signature. As far as I know, the boot sector is loaded as a user process: it does not have a separate thread. Is it possible that a kernel module also has a different signature? A: It may be a kernel panic, when the BIOS writes a different signature to the first sector of your drive. If your boot sector includes the signature of the Kernel itself you can use the OS with the correct version of the kernel, so you may reboot and start a different kernel and discard the previous one. But if the signature of the Kernel does not match your boot sector then you may have to start with a different OS (or use a boot sector of another kernel). In some situations (like BIOS crashes or underpowered hardware) the BIOS cannot run for long enough for a kernel or the boot code to get written, in that situation you cannot boot, and you have to use other techniques, like a UPS or a physical power off button. Cheers By Artem Azar A petition to the United Nations with over 1,000 signatures has been sent to the UN demanding the banning of Evin prison and the freeing of all Iranian political prisoners. The background to the petition is that since the Islamic Revolution in 1979 (1979-2009) there have been over 1,500 signatories in a petition by a group of Turkish lawyers demanding the release of Mehdi Esmayeeli, an Iranian writer and human rights activist who was jailed for writing an article criticizing the leaders of the Revolution. This petition was signed by 47 Turkish lawyers and is now being addressed to the UN.
