It has been shown by a number of workers that pyrodoxal can be obtained from certain bacteria and isomerized to give pyrodoxal-5-phosphate, so that a quantitative determination of pyrodoxal and pyrodoxal phosphate (Odemis et al., 1972; Saha and Kalyana Raju, 1977). Video data files are increasingly being distributed by media distributors using a variety of digital distribution techniques. Video data files are being copied onto magnetic storage disks or other storage mediums, transmitted across the Internet and stored on computer data servers that make the video files available to viewers. The video distribution methods may be different for different video viewing platforms including televisions, personal computers, tablet computers and portable media devices. Since video file distribution systems are increasing in popularity, media distributors have created several methods for protecting video files from being distributed without authorization. These video distribution protection systems may include cryptographic security measures that attempt to determine if a device is authorized to access a protected video file. As an example, an authorization process may be initiated that requires a user to initiate a login at a video distribution device and initiate a login process to determine if the user is authorized to access protected video files. If the login process is successful, the video distribution device may allow access to the video files.

The authorization process may be implemented by using an authorization token, which is a random number received by the video distribution device from the device authorized to access the protected video files. A device may request a token to determine if the device is authorized to access protected video files. When a video distribution device receives an authorization token, the video
