I am writing a library which will be used to run in a multi-threaded environment, but it must also run on Linux and other unix like systems. I have heard that Linux has some sort of Threads implementation under the hood and I am wondering what this means for my library. Can I build the library in a way that it will work on a machine that has been set up with threaded libraries, such as pthreads? A: The SVR4 stdlib has, among many other things, thread primitives. It seems the question is not how to create threads, but how to use threads without using POSIX threads. Starting with standard C, using a toolkit such as pthreads is the recommended way to solve this problem, because it gives you control over the necessary libraries. SVR4 is not a c6a93da74d
